The constitution, as it is known to us, is a document that guarantees the political and civil rights of the citizens of the United States. It is the fundamental law of the nation, and its provisions are enforceable by the federal courts.

The Constitution is divided into seven articles. The first article establishes the legislative branch of government, the Congress, which consists of a bicameral legislature, the Senate and the House of Representatives. The second article outlines the executive branch, headed by the President, and the third article sets up the judicial branch, led by the Supreme Court.

The Constitution also contains amendments, which can be proposed by a two-thirds vote of both houses of Congress or by a constitutional convention called for by the legislatures of two-thirds of the states. These amendments can be ratified by three-quarters of the states, either by legislative action or by specific state conventions.

The Constitution is the supreme law of the land, and it serves as the foundation for all federal and state laws. It is a document that has been revered and respected for over two centuries, and it continues to be the source of inspiration and unity for the people of the United States.
